and a terrible rheumatic condition in my legs was so bad I could hardly get around. I had lots of trouble with indigestion and was as nervous and restless as I could be. Sargon was exactly the medicine I needed. The rheumatic pain gradually disappeared, my system was freed of toxic poisons and I seemed to have a new lease on life itself.

Trial of the Burglars

Mr. Whiting had cited authorities to the effect that persons were prosecuted in criminal cases by such means as to know that the evidence was false and Justice Randolph so decided. The fact of not guilty was then made a forgery and the hearing postponed. The witness, for this purpose, was Mr. Burt, but he testified that he knew about the case. On cross examination he was asked by Pinchum whether he saw the witness at the time and whether he knew of his testimony and whether he was connected with Rube and Jack. The witness, of course, had to answer both questions in the affirmative. Chief Justice Randolph testified in chief, he was asked similar questions by Pinchum, and of course his answers were the same as his father's for neither had seen, till after the trial, the witness.

The curiosity and interest of the people in the court room was at its highest when Tom took the witness stand, and for the first time he was asked in his own way what part he had taken in the affair and he did so in a simple and unostentatious manner, but he gave great credit to Charley and his father for the way they had run the gambling clubs upon Rube and Jack, who had given considerable resistance when they were turned over by him to them and were reduced to obediency.

He told of all who witnessed Pinchum's nervous manner while Tom was telling his story, that he meant when he came his turn to question him, to take the witness by surprise and to ask a number of other ways, to take the starch out of him. Tom's close friends believed it preceded a display of wordy fire works. Pinchum opened his cross examination

Tom, coolly: "I will, sir, when they are proper ones."

Pinechem, sarcastically: "Sho! Sho! Great head! I suppose you know what are proper questions."

Tom: "I have a fair idea, sir, of what are proper questions, as I've often heard justice trials at Lakeport, and have a fair idea of proper ones, I think."

Pinechem, blandly: "Mr. Attorney, you are getting nowhere with your cross-examination of this witness. If you will put questions to him which have some bearing on the case, we shall get along better and move expeditiously."

Pinechem to Tom: "Will you swear, sir, that you saw all these respondents at the time?"

Tom: "I will, sir."

Pinechem: "How could you, if you were not as you say in the bushes?"

Tom: "I was in the bushes, I could see them through a small place in the bushes, while I was well shielded from their observation."

Pinechem: "Pretty good eyesight, eh?"

Tom: "Fairly good, sir. I can see a nigger in a wood pile about as far as anyone I guess."

Pinechem: "Sho! Sho! Wonderful eyes!"

Tom: "That remark doesn't call for any comment from me."

Pinechem: "How could you identify these respondents with the men you say were at the spring?"

Tom: "By their looks, their voices and their clothes."

Pinechem: "How did you happen to be in the store when the store when they tried to enter it?"

Tom: "I was put there by Mr. Benton, and that was the place I desired."

Pinechem: "You say you were afraid we of getting hurt himself?"

Tom: "Don't think so, and from what I know of him and the way he used to talk, I don't think he should say that would be afraid to stay out of these unsavory characters you are defending."

Pinechem: "Wonderful, knowing young man! Did you see the man you shot at?"

Tom: "No, not very clearly."

Pinechem: "Why did you fire two shots at him?"

Tom: "I was quite certain of hitting him, and preventing his getting away."

Pinechem: "Didn't you shoot to kill him, sir?"

Tom: "No sir, I wouldn't have the responsibility for taking his life on my soul for all the treasures of the earth."

Pinechem: "Amazing youth! Humane shoots!"

Tom: "I accomplished my purpose, sir, without serious injury to the miscreant, and that was a great satisfaction to me."

Tom closed Tom's cross examination and he was warmly congratulated by Mr. Whiting, Mr. Benton and Charley. The prosecuting attorney declared that Pinechem for the first time within his recollection had been so shaken by a witness whom he had attempted to grill.

Officer Harry Titus was the last witness. His testimony in chief, detailing his arrest of the respondents, shaken by Pinechem's grill, which was unusually mild, on account, no doubt, of his discomfort with Tom, which evidently had been the cause of his appearance as the burglar were now put upon the witness stand to testify and Pinechem did not think it best to make any argument to the court in his behalf.

After the testimony of the appropriate plea to the court, declared that the tramps had committed a state's prison offense and were entitled to no sympathy and that they should appear again at the next term of the higher court for the county, where they would receive sentence should be fixed so high that they would be certain to be there at that time to receive their punishment.

"I don't like it," announced his decision, stating that it had been proven that the prisoners had committed the crime of burglary and that he would fix the sentence for them as they appeared at the next term of the Superior Court for the county, where they would receive their sentences and as no one could say that this decision gave no mitigation was issued to commit them to the county jail. "This decision gave universal satisfaction."

Mr. Benton knew, of course, from the beginning that he could be but one outcome to the trial. There were chances however, that some mistakes might be made—some slips happen.—Pete might have been convicted of murder; Tom might have been acquitted; or Tom might not show up well in being tried before the albatris ball might be fixed too low—but all had turned out to be most satisfactory manner imaginable to him—particularly as to his protégé, Tom having on his cross examination fairly beaten the most noted criminal lawyer of the county. It was settled that Pete would be hanged by the skin of one's teeth, he thought. He never felt more satisfied with the outcome of a difficulty and so declared to Justice Ransom that the best satisfaction which honors were in store for him at the next election. To Lawyer Whiting he was reserved. For him he declared that he less enjoyed the trial than the hanging.

"Following it out on the Superior Court bench and he added: "Among your associate lawyers (G., you will get the credit of completely flooring Pinchum and making him quit the practice.) Next year, the young men will take a hand in the election I think and believe we there will be something doing. Tom and I are going to make a good team. Successful and he seems to know just what to do in every emergency."

"He does, indeed, Benton. I would like to take him up to my office. He would make a capital lawyer."

"So he would. (G., but I can't spare him. It would break up my steer team, and I want to keep it together.)"

"You may be right, but I don't blame you for being proud of them."

Tom had gone to the express office as soon as he could get away. After his testimony had been given. After the afternoon session of court had adjourned. The witnesses, and these were quickly delivered. Bob Morton, who had been an attentive listener to the proceedings, brought Tom back to the hall after tea. He waited until after he left the hall—the magistrate's decision and the commitment of the prisoners to jail.

"Everybody is praising you," exclaimed Bob Morton, turning to Pinchum. "Lots of people say you ought to be a lawyer. Gee, its great. I'm going to be. Why don't you be a lawyer, Tom? You could cooper the whole bunch." "Wanted to go to law myself, but I am awfully old. Pinchum so smart, but I didn't dare to."

"That's right, Bob. Never make any unusual demonstrations in court. Glad you got a chance to shine today. Now you want to be. (Get your education and there'll be an opening for you over at Lakeport, where there is another old skindink. I don't like those fellows in practice—perhaps you can avoid them anyhow I shall be glad to help you and father will, too, I think, if you really like the law."

"Gee, won't that be great?" exclaimed Bob.

VALUED COMMENDATION

From Hon. Atwood W. Spaulding, Caribou, in Northern Astorostok, has come the following, which it is needless to say I appreciate very highly indeed, coming from a friend of mine, Mr. L. A. W. 1880.

Dear Judge: It's been a long time since I have heard from you except by way of the press, and I thought I would write you a line to let you know I am still in the world with the 'Tom Hadley' story, which pleases and interests me very much. It is of a different sort than any of your writings, but I am familiar with it, and I should show its versatility and you are making a most readable and wholesome story for us all to read. It is a real pleasure to read something so good.

Of course you know we get so many of the other kind that this is refreshing and I say more power to your pen and I hope this will be your last story."

Of course, dear, he is right.

"The 'Advertiser' is a great paper for me, I read it with much interest and it is truly a local paper that covers a lot of ground. I am glad to hear that you and Sanborn must be a real genius to do such a good job."

Mr. Spaulding states that he expects to go to the middle before winter, and should he do so, he will try and see me, which I earnestly hope. If he comes, I'll take him down to the Advertiser office, and I think I will find many of our "read us" who assists in making the paper what it is.

WALT WHITMAN

(III)

One might say that it is not through the commonplace that we attain a high standard of life and how can poets, (indeed to lead men to divine heights) gain their desired end by continually leading the common? We have always supposed that it was by noble and less ordinary lives that we attained a more satisfactory end. Why then this continual harping on the "commonplace"?

Whitman's belief was that no thing existing is unimportant, that every bit of nature should be praised and sung. Whatever extreme ordinariness there was in Whitman assumed a serene nobility and a virile, active strength in his "Leaves". He was so sure of Life and of Himself that he became almost what we should call "fanatical" today in the effort to make the rest of mankind get his philosophy of life. For him, the details (which we find in "Song of Myself" and "Children of Adam" particularly) mean the piecing together of the "parts" to make the complete whole of Nature. The details are essential to round out the meaning of this "eradicating" work.

We do not necessarily have to go about shouting vulgarly and vociferously the unpleasant and sordid circumstances that surround us, if we would follow Whitman. But we can realize the place that all things have in the scheme of existence. We can praise Nature for the breadth of her attributes. We can enlarge our own range of ideas inasmuch as the facts are realized. Though we can always realize, too, that there is something beyond the mere "fact".

But Whitman does not want us to follow him, rather we should "leave all free". And you will ask, "Are we not being too free?" Are these "little sonnets" of the "new brood, native, athletic, continental, greater than before known"? Certainly Whitman could not hide us for niggardliness of subject matter. What is there yet that has not been written into a poem in recent years?

Perhaps he might dislike our lack of sheer bold running-up of detail such as he uses in the "Leaves". He might not only scoff, he might resent that in our two weeks with Mr. Myers' parents, they made the trip by auto, visiting other friends in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. They were greatly impressed by the grandeur of the Annapolis peninsula, the Annapolis Royal, and the great interest to them was a fox farm in Prince Edward Island, where some of the finest silver black foxes are being raised.
